Jody Wood: Collecting Health

Open Source Gallery is pleased to present Collecting Health, an exhibit by Jody Wood.

What is Collecting Health?

Collecting Health is an exhibition by Jody Wood, which includes a “Social Pharmacy” and other works that relate to healing and what makes us feel good. Visitors to the pharmacy can take homemade medicines and other nice things that people have shared, and they can leave their own recipes or make things in the gallery. Maybe you’ll write about something that helps you feel better when you’re sick, mix together plants that smell good, or sculpt something that will make another visitor smile.

Who is Jody Wood?

Jody Wood makes Social Practice art, including photographs, videos, performances, and a series of “Social Pharmacies” like the one at Open Source Gallery. She makes public artwork and teaches people about health, care, and hardships.

What is Collecting Health about?

Collecting Health is about the way that people’s beliefs, trust, and community affect the way they think and feel about medicine. When you are sick, do you take medicine because your parents tell you it’s the best way to feel better? Why do you listen to your doctors and nurses? Jody Wood wants us to think about the things we do to feel better and why we do them, and consider how nature and the people around us can help.
